Opposition to the Pacific Mail

New York, March 10—The steamer Saratoga sailed for Panama yesterday with [illegible] Notwithstanding the fact of the proposed opposition to the Pacific Mail, nevertheless many still believe the only effect of the opposition is to force better rates for the transcontinental railroad.

Bowen's Last Statement

The Herald describes Bowen's last statement as manly and partly honest, and [illegible] Tilton's statement except with the help of Plymouth Church. It will compel Plymouth to call her oldest members to the stand and read an indictment that could not have been read so long had not Beecher's lawyer directed attention from it. The lesson should be slowly and [illegible] Beecher will be with the [illegible] Bowen speaks truly and Bowen knows the knowledge of Beecher's guilt were at once [illegible] summoning him for spiritual advice to the bedside of his own dying wife. The Tribune says Beecher is ridiculous. He offers Plymouth Church he had reasons not to [illegible] refused to put the matter in the hands of a committee of three. [illegible] Beecher politely but refuses

Rise to the Pacific Mail

NEW YORK, March 1.—The Mexmor South sailed for Panama yesterday. She [illegible] of the proposed opposition to the [illegible] Nevertheless many still believe the only [illegible] of the opposition is to force better terms [illegible] sanctioned.

Bowen's Last Statement.

The Herald describes Bowen's last statement [illegible] gray and partly hearsay and doubt and [illegible] incomplete evidence of nothing in particular except with the help of Bowen's shrewdness [illegible] will compel Plymouth Church to choose [illegible] between the pastor and her truest members [illegible] and find an indorsement that could not have [illegible] long had not indecent acts passage of [illegible] directed attention from it. The semi-[illegible] bound and Beecher will both with the [illegible] last statement better understood and the [illegible] settled the matter. No more disgraceful [illegible] business was ever known which [illegible] than this. Still it has [illegible] whoever lies—than this. Still it has [illegible] which a man can invent. But he said [illegible] that obligation just a little need will [illegible] Plymouth Church had reasons for [illegible] Beecher guilty but refuses to put them in [illegible] He declares he received confes[illegible] women of guilt with Beecher but [illegible] whom were under the most solemn obliga[illegible] whom a man can incur. But he said [illegible] that obligation just a little need will [illegible] names to a committee of investigation [illegible] to have consented to any of the persons [illegible] to have promised in the negotiations that it would be no [illegible] to give them over to committees [illegible] in the matter did no woman whom he [illegible] shall have the privilege of confronting [illegible] who He will destroy them but [illegible] the dark. FORTY YEARS AGO.

...Review of the events of the week, since forty years ago...

THE MAN ANNIE LOVED

She was a little girl of 12 or 13, it is true, with curls and white frock. Milton Etheridge sat watching her from the window as she played with her companions in the garden. She was skipping very carefully in her bullions in dress with high slits on at the throat and looping back of brown hair.

How as we may deplore the unimportance of dress in modern life, there is no more delicate history of human sentiment than that which Venus herself would thoroughly understand. A tucked gown and open throat, long or Apollo in a skirt, tucked coat with bright buttons. A nine-hundredth knows the value of dress and what is more the knack how to attire herself in just the manner most becoming to her. She was not much prettier than dozens of other young ladies but there was something about her way in her manner and people in Hudson into the habit of calling her beautiful. She had a clear wild rose brown complexion, dark hair that was straight, glossy, continually [illegible] into curls and ringlets so natural to it.

Milton Etheridge grave silent wise lawyer wondered within himself how long he had loved Lucretia Annie. He and his cousin Mr Six years ago she had come to the [illegible] the dying request of Mrs Etheridge's best friend. The good lady had been a mother to her ever since and Milton had played the part of a kind elder brother. Annie was 15 when she came to live and she was now 25. Yes, he was sure he had loved her for six years. She had much everything was different. Her pretty ways of arranging curtains, and flowers and books, and knick knacks had brightened up the quaintly old house wonderfully. Milton thought it was strange how he and his lady mother had ever managed to live without her.

So he sat and looked at her as she made the shining steel flash in and out the bright fleecy wool. Not that he thought of ever doing anything more to her than he was now. His love was pure yet. It had not reached that passionate stage when it will not be subdued by any obstacles. He was old—40 at least—and it would be childish for him to hope she would ever link her young fresh life with that of a man whose hair was getting gray on the temples.

But there was something more to destroy the hope, if he had dared to indulge it. At one time, perhaps he had indulged it but certainly not now. Annie Huntley had had her life romance as well as other women. It had been sweet at first—painfully bitter at last. It had made her smile graver, her color more fleeting, her manner at times subdued and sad—so Etheridge thought.

Annie and Leigh Richardson had met under somewhat romantic circumstances. He had saved her from drowning at Cape May when she had ventured beyond her depth, and after her removal to Graymead he had followed her there and located himself in the practice of his profession—the law. He had been a constant visitor for two years. People began to speak of them as belonging to each other and Mrs Etheridge had, with a woman's peculiar delight, begun to anticipate the wedding supper and the bridal trousseau. Etheridge had looked on with a dull pain at his heart, for which he felt half angry with himself. Surely he ought to rejoice that Annie would be so happy, for Richardson was every way estimable, and was rising rapidly in his profession.

Suddenly, however about two years before the opening of our story, his visits to Annie ceased and he began a violent flirtation with Miss Seymour, the belle of the village. Annie did not die of account of it—she did not even mope in girls generally do when crossed in love. Her manner was a little subdued her laugh came less frequently but she was not [illegible] broken—she put aside sympathy. Mrs Etheridge would have offered her quiet [illegible] gave her confidence to no one. Sometimes she met Richardson but they exchanged no words—not even the ordinary ceremonious greetings of mere acquaintance. They were as completely separated as if an ocean rolled between them.

Etheridge sat watching Annie and thinking of all this he noticed, with a thrill of pain that she was a little paler, a little more quiet than usual. He remembered that she had met Richardson at the picture gallery that day.

Some magnetic influence in the gaze of Etheridge made Annie look up. She flushed under the serene luster of those dark gray eyes and her fingers forgot their cunning and dropped the ball of zephyr she was unwinding. It rolled toward the fire—there was a genuine old fashioned wood fire upon the hearth—and, in stooping to recover it, her light sleeve dipped into the blaze. The flames leaped up—Milton sprang forward, caught her in his arms and crushed out the fire.

She was frightened, weak and dizzy with remembering what she had escaped, and for a moment she stood circled in his arms, her head on his shoulder her soft hair resting against his cheek. The touch thrilled him with startling power. He was hardly himself. All the love he had so long kept under control rose up like an unbound tyrant. He pressed his lips passionately to hers—he would have told her then how dear she was to him, but so nothing seemed to hold him back. He would wait a little until the excitement of her recent peril would be over—he would wait, and think it over calmly. All that might be set up thinking of his course. He had [illegible] with all his soul he should never care for another woman. But he was quite aware of the tender [illegible] of her heart. What if she had still a lingering tenderness for Richardson? He feared so—he believed so—he knew it. Such a picture which he [illegible] surely was his. Would he take his wife to [illegible] Richardson's picture? Would he like to think she had never kissed it. Then he remembered how [illegible] had looked at her and took courage. It might be that the old [illegible] could be forgotten in the new. At any rate he would know before the sleet he said with sudden resolution, and after Annie had left the room down for a walk. He knew a few of [illegible] according to the [illegible] and [illegible] he went [illegible]
